Are you struggling to become a musician? Imagine trying to read and write without first learning the alphabet.

Without knowing the alphabet, how much more difficult would it be to learn words like “cat” and “dog”? What about “mysteriously”? Any achievements would be hard won and easily forgotten, much less would anyone be able to tackle phrases, sentences, paragraphs, and reading a book.

If Person Alpha learned the alphabet and Person Beta didn't, Beta might think Alpha has strange superhero powers because Alpha can learn new words much more quickly, master ever more complex language constructs, and will appear to have a prodigious memory. Without knowing the alphabet, it would be difficult to impossible to get off the ground.

Now consider the following scenarios: You love music, yet have struggled — possibly for years — with trying to learn an instrument. Or maybe you love to sing, but lack the confidence to join your local choir. Think about the parent of a child who clearly enjoys music, and yet, that child doesn't like to practice. Should you or a child continue playing an instrument if every lesson ends with breaking down in tears?

Maybe you're wondering how you're going to become a musician when you may have school, a full-time job, a family, or modern life in general.

You know someone who sings or plays an instrument beautifully, and they may even be your music teacher.
